Excerpt from An Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species: Particularly the African; Translated From a Latin Dissertation, Which Was Honoured With the First Prize in the University of Cambridge, for the Year 1785

If therefore, it has been at all instrumental in itself, or has led me to such exertions as may have been in any degree instrumental, in procuring that general attention to the slave trade, which prevails at present, and which I am confident in the course of time will be productive of its abolition, the merit of so important an event will ultimately devolve upon you; and you will be found to have exhibited to other seminaries an example, and to the world at large a proof, that, while you have been endeavouring to promote the cause of learning, you have not been inattentive to the unalienable rights of men.

If there is any other circumstance, that will additionally mark the propriety of the present address, it is the very conspicuous part, which you have since taken, in promoting the same cause, not only by public and private subscriptions, but by an application to the legislature of your country.
