THE TRUE PATH OF THE FIRST EUROPEAN EXPLORER OF TEXAS: Chronicling the Amazing Journey of Cabeza de Vaca Lawrence Sharp

When in November of 1528 his log barge sank off the Texas coast Álvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca (1490?-1562?) thought he would not be able to return to civilization and that he was doomed with the others of the expedition of Pánfilo de Narváez (d. 1528). But he went to the Amerindians for help, after he stopped sobbing, and they taught him to be a respected físico (physician) who could travel from village to village offering his healing services as well as seashells and cane sticks for barter. His service as a físico, along with his optimistic faith and strong leadership abilities, enabled him to successfully lead three others to New Spain; he left a favorable legacy among the native people that lasted for decades. Based on new methods of research and analysis it is now possible to identify the landmass “Malhado” on which he landed as a shorter Galveston Island and to trace the entire route of his overland journey to “Corazones” a village near the Pacific coast of Sonora. Dr. Lawrence D. Sharp is an independent researcher who has spent over eight years studying the overland journey of Cabeza de Vaca. A lawyer in private practice in Dallas he is a former history teacher who has been a speaker in churches and at gatherings of lawyers. Married to a Spanish teacher he has two sons. Holding both a Doctor of Ministry in church history from Vanderbilt and a Juris Doctor in law from Tulane he brings a unique perspective to this captivating story. Contending that the other books are wrong at key points, he has compiled a positive narrative that shows that the native Americans taught Cabeza de Vaca to be a physician and, following established trails near creeks and rivers, we can discover where he really was in the long overland voyage. For comments and questions Mr. Sharp can be reached at lawrencesharp639@gmail.com.
