All Aboard the pirate ship

John balled his fists and tried his best not to punch Thomas in front of everyone watching them talk after the pirate ship had gone. “You say one more word about my captainship and I swear to the sea, I will push you off the Susan Constant myself.”

Thomas was taken aback by the captain’s words. He apologized profusely and went back on supervising the ship’s crew. The rest of the men onboard went back to doing their tasks as well.

“That idiot,” John said after Thomas was gone. “If only he and the Queen knew what the Captain and I do.” He sniggered to himself as he looked out to the wide ocean in front of him. Birds were flying overhead and a group of dolphins hopped out of the water and dived back again on the distance.

“Honor. I have no honor,” he continued talking to himself while he enjoyed the calming beauty of the ocean, laughing at his own dark thoughts. “If they all knew what the Captain and I are up to, I will be fed to the sharks, certainly. Good lord, isn’t it good to have a secret life like me?”

“But I am so getting tired of the life of a good fellow. This righteous thing is starting to bore me,” he said to himself.

The Susan Constant traveled for another two months until they reached England again. Apparently, the island where Tarzan was from was situated between England and the New World. By the time they reached the shores of home, John Smith had decided to leave the Queen’s army of trustees and join Captain Hook full time aboard their sailing gentleman’s club. And he was taking Tarzan with him.
