Not illustrated. 1860 edition. Excerpt: ...an embargo was immediately laid on the British shipping, and the Elbe and the Weser were closed against the English flag. At the same time, a detachment of 15,000 Danish soldiers, under Prince Charles, landgrave of Hesse, took possession of Hamburg and Lubec, in order to stop the trade and navigation of Britain on the Elbe. The English consul there had repeatedly warned all vessels in the river to accelerate their departure, some of which obeyed the admonition, while others, not apprehending danger, were detained. The situation of England at that period was extremely critical; only a year before she had taken the lead in the coalition against France; now she found herself obliged to resist the combined hostility of Europe, with an exhausted treasury, and a population suffering from the double visitation of famine and pestilence. On the other hand, the might of Bonaparte had increased with unexampled rapidity. Austria was unable to withstand his victorious armies.; Italy and Switzerland crouched beneath his eagles; Spain openly declared in his favour; and Holland was reduced to a province of the republic. As the chances of success in Britain now depended on her striking a decisive blow at the outset, and anticipating, by the celerity of her movements, that combination of force which threatened the national independence, the most vigorous measures were resorted to with a view to bring the controversy to a speedy termination. In the beginning of Annual Register, an. 1800, 1801. Alison's History of Europe, vol. iv., p. 479-485. March (12th) a powerful squadron, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, four frigates, and about thirty gunboats, sailed from Yarmouth, under Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, with Nelson second in command, fresh from the glories...
